Museums: to Charge or not to Charge?

Nowadays, according to many researches, the interest to the history of mankind is steadily diminishing. In its turn, ~~it has~~ the decrease has become a ~~reason~~ reason for museum to put a charge for people. The purpose of this article is to decide whether it is necessary to ~~er~~ fee in museums or not.

In my opinion, museums should not charge for admission for several reasons. Firstly, having to pay ~~would~~ ^{usually} only prevents people from going to museums and makes the process even more tedious. Secondly, free admission would surely increase people's desire to go there, so the museum's ^{attendance} attendance would have a dramatical growth. Thirdly, free access to such cultural places would develop people's level of knowledge of historic disciplines by leaps and bounds. As it can be seen, charges in museums only hinder those many benefits that free admission can give.

To confirm those theories, I would like to give a practical instance of the way free access would benefit our society. Recently, there has been established a so-called Pushkin's card in Russia, which allow people to attend various galleries, exhibitions and museums as well without any charge, though the amount ^{of possible attendances} of it is quite limited. As a result, ~~per~~ many young people started to use it and attend cultural centres. As for me, I made a use of it too and I can say that it is a great opportunity to submerge in the world of history.

To summarize all of the above, ~~needles~~ it is needless to say that the advantages of free admission ⁱⁿ museums outweigh the disadvantages. It would be highly beneficial to the whole country to remove charges in historic centres to allow people to get acquainted with the inheritance of mankind.
